ANNUAL REPORT

Breakthroughs

Making life better in our diverse and complex community can be slow and careful work. Building relationships and trust takes time. Finding the most effective and equitable way forward often requires research and trial and error. But eventually, we reach that BREAKTHROUGH moment when we see results. The moment when other organizations, even other states, see our work and want to replicate it. The moment when our careful thought and research translates into action and energy. This happened in much of our work in 2015. Read some of those stories here.

Visionary Leadership. Jewish Values. Commitment to Excellence. Trusted Stewardship. Working with Others. Jewish Community.

You may have seen these words associated with Rose Community Foundation before. They are our foundation's values and guiding principles. We encourage you to read more about them on our website at rcfdenver.org/valuesandprinciples.

We have highlighted these values and principles because 2015 was our 20-year anniversary. 2015 also marks 20 years of these values and principles guiding our work in the Greater Denver community. In looking back on both 2015 and our past 20 years of work, we recognize how critical these values are in our efforts to successfully address enduring community challenges, enhance quality of life and create lasting change for the better.

In 2015, we experienced several significant and visible accomplishments related to our long-term work. We attribute that progress to a commitment to work that includes collaborative partnerships, innovative thinking, thoughtful risk-taking and a disciplined focus on lasting results — all concepts that are expressed in our values statement.

In this report, we share with you several “breakthroughs” that demonstrate these beliefs at work. We are working with individuals and families to establish and maintain philanthropic traditions, and with area nonprofit organizations to ensure their stability and longevity through endowment funds.

Innovative programs in our Aging and Education Program Areas are being replicated locally and nationally, and unique partnerships in Child and Family Development, Health and Jewish Life Program Areas are making significant progress.

These breakthroughs are examples of what we continually strive for as a foundation. They are rarely easy to accomplish, usually require a long-term view and nearly always mean a great deal of collaboration with others.

Breakthroughs like these also represent milestones along a path of progress. Our work certainly is not done and we have not yet fixed all of the issues, but we are part way there and that is cause to celebrate. It is also cause for thanks.

Thank you to everyone involved in this work to make the Greater Denver community a better place for all people: donors who believe in our work; friends and colleagues who inspire us; leaders who trust that progress is possible and take risks with us; Foundation staff and partners who believe in working together for greater impact; and the new people who will join us over the next 20 years, and beyond. We look forward to our continued work together.

Colorado funders unite in ambitious effort to support early childhood mental health

We know from research that a child's earliest years (from birth to age five) are among the most crucial for healthy development. Mental health — or social and emotional wellness — is a critical component.

According to the Center for the Developing Child at Harvard University, the foundation for sound mental health is built early in life as early experiences shape the architecture of the developing brain. Disruptions in this developmental process can impair a child's capacities for learning and relating to others, with lifelong implications. For society, many costly problems, ranging from the failure to complete high school to incarceration to homelessness, could be dramatically reduced if attention were paid to improving children's environments in terms of relationships and experiences early in life.

Recognizing its potential impact on Colorado communities, Rose Community Foundation started exploring the issue of early childhood mental health in 2011. Our Child and Family Development and Health Program Areas began working together. They reached out to Caring for Colorado to form a collaborative group of Colorado funders spanning health and early childhood disciplines, with the intention of increasing their collective knowledge.

Preschool expulsions are one example of why this is an important topic for Colorado. "An increasing number of young children are being expelled or suspended from childcare centers and preschool due to behavior issues," explains Elsa Holguín, Rose Community Foundation senior program officer for Child and Family Development. "This is concerning because not only is an expelled child at risk of missing out on the benefit of early childhood education, but there's also likely something going on in that child's life driving the behavior issues, thus putting that child's social and emotional health at risk."

Long-term health is also a concern. "We know from brain research that repeated exposure to adverse experiences in early childhood can lead to increased health risks as an adult, including heart disease, diabetes and depression," says Whitney Gustin Connor, Rose Community Foundation senior program officer for Health.

To help address issues like these before they worsen down the road, early identification and whole family support are among proven best practices. "Colorado has many programs doing great work in these areas. Yet many Colorado families, especially those in vulnerable situations still struggle to get the support they need," explains Jeannie Ritter, former first lady of Colorado, mental health ambassador for the Mental Health Center of Denver, and Rose Community Foundation trustee.

In 2015, the funders collaborative made a significant move to help improve the situation. Eight partners pooled $11.2 million to create a five-year initiative called LAUNCH Together modeled after a highly successful (and similarly named) federal program. Rose Community Foundation is among the funding partners and serves as fiscal sponsor, while the nonprofit organization Early Milestones Colorado, is managing the initiative.

Through LAUNCH Together, grants are awarded to selected Colorado communities to plan and implement coordinated support systems for early childhood mental health. "The ultimate goal is that everyone involved in a young child's life — child care providers, schools, family members and doctors — is paying attention to his or her social and emotional health and that there's coordination between all the systems to ensure the right support for children and their families," explains Ritter.

LAUNCH Together communities will focus their planning efforts around five key prevention and wellness strategies: 1) integration of behavioral health into primary care; 2) mental health consultation in early care and education settings; 3) enhanced home visiting services; 4) parent education and family strengthening; and 5) assessment and screening.

LAUNCH stands for Linking Actions for Unmet Needs in Children's Health. Learn more about LAUNCH Together at launchtogethercolorado.org.

Senior Source becomes a national model for information access

An 85-year-old woman can no longer drive but she needs to get to her doctor’s appointments – where does she turn for help? An elderly couple received an eviction notice for their apartment and their caregiver wants to understand the legalities involved – but where does he start?

Thanks to a collaborative effort designed and launched 10 years ago through the Foundation’s leadership and funding, Colorado has found a winning formula: Senior Source, which took an exciting step toward national replication in 2015. Over the life of Senior Source, Rose Community Foundation has invested more than $2.5 million in the program, and has helped bring partners together, including Caring for Colorado Foundation, the Colorado Department of Human Services — Colorado Commission on Aging, The Colorado Health Foundation, and the Denver Regional Council of Governments — Area Agency on Aging. Senior Source provides a central and trusted place for older adults and caregivers to find important resources about aging issues. A website, 9NEWS programming, community outreach events, call-in sessions and social media collectively educate and empower individuals to locate resources and access services available in the local community.

“Transportation services, housing options, crisis assistance, and knowing where to go for information and access to services can be a serious challenge, especially for older adults and their caregivers,” explains Therese Ellery, Rose Community Foundation senior program officer for Aging.

“Senior Source reaches not one, but two underserved populations,” says Mark Koebrich, recently retired 9NEWS anchor and a 9NEWS spokesperson for the program. “In addition to thousands of seniors anxious for information of every description, Senior Source also reaches thousands of their children who are helping their parents navigate the often troubled and difficult waters of growing older. The program has proven to be a valuable resource for all of them, and I’m very proud of my past involvement in this innovative project.”

Each year, more than 2 million people see the 9NEWS programming that covers important aging topics. Annually, 100,000 people visit the website, and Senior Source distributes 10,000 free resources like the Getting There Guide to transportation options and the Senior Law Handbook (both of which are supported with grants from Rose Community Foundation). In addition, program partners respond to thousands of calls and emails.

“For this to work as well as it does, you need the right people at the table. We have the right people,” says Lynne Valencia, 9NEWS vice president of community relations, speaking about the collaborative group that now guides, funds, and operates Senior Source (9NEWS, Colorado Department of Human Services — Colorado Commission on Aging, Daniels Fund, Denver Regional Council of Governments — Area Agency on Aging and Rose Community Foundation).

In 2015, 9NEWS and its parent company, TEGNA, recognized that other communities around the country could benefit from the program, and decided to make a national commitment to Senior Source, making it available across the country through its 46 stations. Colorado’s program, with 10 years of experience, serves as a model, yet each station will customize the program to best fit its local community.

“No other station has taken the topic of seniors to the forefront,” says Valencia. “9NEWS is invested in this program because we see the value it brings to our community. Now dozens more communities, and tens of thousands more people will benefit from it.”

Rose Community Foundation has been involved with Senior Source since its inception, helping design and launch the collaborative program. We continue to support it annually by serving on the Advisory Committee and through funding support. Learn more at rcfdenver.org/aging.

Communities offer teens new ways to engage in Jewish life

Do you remember life as a teenager? Maybe you currently have a teen growing up in your home?

“The teenage years are a critical period when we start asking ourselves who we want to be when we grow up. We are developing values, an identity, and connections to people and passions,” explains Lisa Farber Miller, Rose Community Foundation senior program officer for Jewish Life. “Jewish communities can support teens in significant ways. Yet, for years, we have seen a growing disengagement of teens in Jewish life,” she adds.

In 2009, Rose Community Foundation’s Jewish Life Program Area began studying this disengagement. The Foundation brought stakeholders together from the Greater Denver community and developed a plan for change. Eventually in 2014, the necessary components fell into place when funders and practitioners came together. That launched an ambitious effort, The Jewish Teen Education and Engagement Initiative, which aims to increase the number and diversity of Jewish teens participating in Jewish experiences and to deepen the quality and reach of teen engagement in Jewish life in the Denver-Boulder community.

“We are committed to focusing our resources during formative times when Jewish identity is being developed, such as the teen years. We want to make sure our teens understand how Jewish traditions, rituals, values, and ethics can support the good they want to do in the world,” explains Farber Miller.

The Initiative, one of the largest ever undertaken by the Foundation, is supported by more than $5.6 million and more than 30 funders, and involves significant collaboration both locally and nationally. Jim Joseph Foundation, one of the largest Jewish foundations in the world, and Rose Community Foundation are partnering to lead the effort. Five local nonprofit organizations received grants to engage local teens in new and innovative ways. All five grantees are working closely together to make a difference locally. Additionally, our Denver/Boulder community is among 10 communities collaborating nationwide to share strategies and learnings from these efforts as part of the Jewish Teen Education and Engagement Funder Collaborative.

One year into the Initiative, results are emerging. The grantee organizations are offering new and more programs and working together to adapt successful approaches. Participation is on the rise across the board, especially in programs that are teen-led and that connect teens to Jewish experiences through special interests such as art or community service.

“I have never been excited to participate in an activity in my Jewish community before,” says one local teen who is a fellow with PresentTense Colorado, a new program that helps passionate Jewish teens in Denver/Boulder address social issues through social entrepreneurship. “Usually teen programs for Jews are held in large auditoriums with hundreds of teens, and I am not the best in large groups. This lets me impact my Jewish community in a large way but in an environment that I am comfortable with.”

One mom explains the appeal of another program, Rosh Hodesh: It’s a Girl Thing!, a successful gender-based, monthly discussion group for Jewish teens, operated by grantee Moving Traditions. “The participatory activities and use of art for the girls to express themselves have been a consistent draw for [my daughter]. One indication that she enjoys the opportunity is the lack of complaining about having to attend — a true testament that a 13-year-old girl really enjoys an activity!”

All five grantees quickly point to collaboration as one of the most fruitful outcomes so far. “We are learning so much more about each other’s programs,” explains Karen Silverman, executive director of JHub, a grantee organization created by the Initiative and serving as a support “hub” for all Jewish teen professionals and programs in the Denver/Boulder community. “Our new mantra is if a teen does not like my program, I have a responsibility to introduce them to another. We are making sure the kids are the most important thing.”

Successful middle school model expands to offer Beacon of hope for Southwest Denver students

Denver’s K-12 public school system has seen a number of positive improvements toward student success in recent years; however an achievement gap (when one group of students outperforms another group) continues to exist between students from low-income families and communities of color and their peers.

The achievement gap is especially apparent in Southwest Denver. According to a recent report by A+ Denver, the region serves more than 22,000 kids (about 27 percent of the Denver Public School District) and has a 90 percent low income and 84 percent Latino population. The report also shares that only 15 percent of Southwest Denver students are college-ready by the time they graduate high school.

For the past three years, Rose Community Foundation, in partnership with the Ford Foundation, has helped schools and communities in Southwest Denver and throughout the Denver Metro area implement innovative practices to work toward closing this achievement gap. The partnership’s investments have focused on an emerging practice called More and Better Learning Time.

Photos: Grant Beacon Middle School students have access to a variety of enrichment programs within extended school hours.

“Central to More and Better Learning Time is extending the school day to provide more quality time for activities that support academic achievement such as enrichment programming, student interventions, tutoring, and advanced classes,” explains Janet Lopez, Rose Community Foundation senior program officer for Education.

Grant Beacon Middle School in Southwest Denver is one example of how these investments are making a difference. Three years ago the school faced possible closure. Today it has become a model for success, and its success is becoming a resource for other area middle schools.

To turn itself around, with the help of grants from the Ford Foundation and Rose Community Foundation, Grant Beacon implemented an approach that includes an extended school day, blended learning (combining technology with one-on-one instruction) and a focus on character development. That combination of strategies has proven to be an ideal recipe for student success in a school whose student population is comprised of 85 percent free and reduced lunch eligible, 93 percent minority, 40 percent second language learners and 15 percent special education.

“We have seen incredible academic growth. We are outperforming nearly all the charter schools in the area,” says Alex Magaña, Grant Beacon Middle School principal.

The model is so successful in fact, that it is now being replicated. In a ground-breaking move, Magaña and his team will implement the “Grant Beacon” model at Kepner Middle School starting with the sixth grade class in the 2016-2017 school year. This is the first time a public “innovation school” will be replicated; something only charter schools have done before.

“We already have a waiting list for Kepner,” says Magaña, pointing to the significant enthusiasm and support he is seeing from parents and others in the Southwest Denver community.

Similar to the way charter schools are managed, a new “Beacon Network” will serve as the managing organization over the schools.

“Grant Beacon’s model is achieving excellent results and it is critical that we, as a community, find ways to scale successful models like these and make progress toward closing the achievement gap,” says Lopez. “Rose Community Foundation is honored to be a long-time partner in this important effort.”

A Celebration of 20 Years

In June at the Seawell Ballroom in downtown Denver, Rose Community Foundation celebrated 20 years of serving the Greater Denver community. Joined by friends, donors and grantees, Foundation leaders looked back on the work the Foundation has done.

At the event, Governor John Hickenlooper spoke at length about Rose Community Foundation's leadership on issues like Denver's Road Home while he served as mayor of Denver. Foundation President and CEO Sheila Bugdanowitz also spoke about the story of the Foundation, its leadership role in the Jewish community and its other grantmaking focus areas. Chair of the Board of Trustees Jerry Glick spoke about the Foundation's current impact in the community, and Jennifer Atler Fischer, past board chair announced the winners of Innovate for Good (see page 13).

Innovate for Good finds and funds new projects

In 2015, Rose Community Foundation created Innovate for Good, a venture to find and fund new, innovative projects. Launched in January, the challenge received nearly 400 entries from local nonprofit organizations, engineers, artists, neighborhood associations, teenagers, retirees and others who answered the question, "What new and innovative idea would you bring to life to make the Greater Denver community a better place to live?"

A team of 130 community members helped to select the winning ideas, evaluating them for innovation, ability to make a difference, feasibility and alignment with Rose Community Foundation's mission to enhance the quality of life in Denver. In June, during Rose Community Foundation's 20th Anniversary event, the nine winners were awarded funds totaling $250,000.

The following nine projects were selected as winners:

Bright by Text

Bright by Three's educational text-messaging system expands to provide parents with localized community resources and information.

Clean River Design Challenge

The Greenway Foundation's design competition for Metropolitan State University of Denver students to create a mechanism to remove trash from the South Platte River.

Creative Youth Take Flight - La Alma Connection

Arts Street's program for youth to create a master art plan and public art series to encourage pedestrian use of the light rail and 10th Avenue in the La Alma neighborhood.

Fresh Food Connect

Groundwork Denver's new mobile app to allow home gardeners to donate extra produce for distribution at food banks and through affordable sale.

Race, Policing and Community Justice Advocates

Shorter Community AME Church's program to engage high school students as peer presenters in the areas of racial equality, community awareness based policing and justice advocacy work.

Shakespeare in the Parking Lot

Denver Center for the Performing Arts' "food truck for the arts," taking theatrical performances to high school students in school parking lots.

The Stompin' Ground Games

Warm Cookies of the Revolution's year-long Olympics-style competition between Denver neighborhoods, combining arts, culture and history in the name of civic pride and engagement.

Nonprofit organizations take steps to sustain their future with new endowment funds

Endowment: A restricted fund made up of gifts and bequests to a nonprofit organization. The principal of this fund remains intact and generates earnings that can add to the organization's operating revenue.

Endowments provide organizations with ongoing financial stability by providing an annual distribution earned year after year from investing the endowment fund's principal. Endowments also provide donors with additional ways to support their favorite nonprofits through legacy gifts and bequests.

For the past 15 years, Rose Community Foundation has invested in the stability and longevity of nonprofits in the Greater Denver community by managing endowment and designated funds. At the end of 2015, the Foundation stewarded endowment and designated funds cumulatively valued at $49 million for 49 different nonprofits. In addition to managing and stewarding funds, the Foundation has also provided comprehensive training and coaching to nonprofit leadership teams.

Foundation staff has helped development (fundraising) leaders and board members integrate specific fundraising strategies to launch and build endowment funds into their overall development plans.

In the late 1990s, Foundation programs like The Endowment Challenge and Live On: Build Your Jewish Legacy provided both training and incentives for building an endowment fund, particularly for Jewish organizations. In 2015, the Foundation extended this model to a broad range of local nonprofits, including arts and advocacy organizations, further ensuring stability for organizations with wide ranging influence on life around our community. The group of 12 organizations includes Foundation initiatives like Rose Youth Foundation and the Latino Community Foundation of Colorado, alongside organizations like the Colorado Ballet, Denver Film Society and RedLine Gallery. Participating organizations take part in a series of training sessions and also receive matching grants for participating and putting what they learn into practice.

Mike Guthrie, the chief operating officer for the Carson J. Spencer Foundation said that the opportunity to join this program prompted his organization to establish an endowment fund, which the organization would not have pursued otherwise. "We are a small nonprofit with big goals," he says. "But establishing an endowment wasn't something we thought we were capable of, given the size and capacity of our organization." The Carson J. Spencer Foundation works to prevent suicide and assist those coping with pain and grief resulting from a loss by suicide.

Guthrie says he now understands how having an endowment positions his organization differently for donors. "It provides a sense of permanence and makes clear that we have a long-term future," he says.

For Maya Brook, the executive director of Mending Faces, an organization that provides surgical care to impoverished children in the Philippines with cleft lip and cleft palate, a valuable part of her participation in the cohort was putting together an integrated development plan. "It has been really good education for me and for the board," she says. "We are so lucky to get this training." She remarked that they were motivated to participate because donors had expressed an interest in including Mending Faces in their will, and it was quickly apparent that the organization did not have the appropriate policies and other infrastructure to accept these long-term gifts.

"As a community foundation, we have a unique role to play by helping nonprofits develop avenues to sustainability," said Director of Philanthropic Services Gaye Leonard. "We can help these organizations develop long-term strategies and discipline to integrate the endowment and legacy giving into their overall development plan."

Senior Gift Planning Officer Vicki Dansky takes great satisfaction in the fact the Foundation is helping to build a rich future for Denver's nonprofit community. "We believe that legacy gifts and the future impact of building endowments will strengthen our community in ways we cannot even imagine," she says.

"As a community foundation, we have a unique role to play by helping nonprofits develop avenues to sustainability."

Finding meaning in stewardship: leaving a family legacy

“It is our way of capturing and continuing the values of these amazingly generous people who have supported the community, and committed to doing so even beyond their lifetime.”

One of the unique roles a community foundation can play is to steward charitable bequests (gifts specified in a will) and other types of planned gifts in a way that particularly honors donors’ intentions and values. Rose Community Foundation takes this role very seriously. “People have different goals for their charitable bequests,” explains Vicki Dansky, senior gift planning officer. “Sometimes they want to use philanthropy as a way to keep their adult children close to each other, and some use their legacy gift planning to open or continue a conversation with their children and grandchildren about values they hope to perpetuate through the generations.”

Julie A. Malek and her husband Rick J. Kornfeld have included a gift to the Foundation in their will for their children to direct in the future. They also had conversations with their children about their intentions for the gift. Malek says that the process of making the gift has been really important to them as a family. Both Malek and Kornfeld grew up in Denver and they have both had parents die. She says that including Rose Community Foundation — with its strong connections to the history of Rose Medical Center and the Denver community — in their will felt like a powerful connection to their parents’ history here. “The really beautiful thing is that our gift feels like a legacy from both of our families,” she remarks.

As legacy donors, Kornfeld and Malek have also contributed meaningful images and memorabilia to the Living Legacy Tapestry, which hangs in the Foundation’s lobby. “It was really special to be able to do that; we were able to include pieces of our parents’ history,” says Malek.

The Living Legacy Tapestry is composed by artists Leah Sobsey and Lynn Bregman Blass of visualhistorycollaborative.com. Dansky says that the Tapestry is an important visual archive of donors’ values. “It is our way of capturing and continuing the values of these amazingly generous people who have supported the community and committed to doing so even beyond their lifetime,” she says.

Malek says that talking with their children and documenting their own intentions has been an important exercise. “Our kids will know what is important to us, but they will have some freedom to make their own decisions, too.”
